

The world's most fearsome terrorist is dead, but the threat of global terrorism is far from over. In a rare interview with one of this country's top agents, we learn what it takes to be a little big soldier in the war on terror. This post includes: -An overview of terrorism in war zones and in America -What it means to be a soldier who has watched their comrades lose their lives or been horribly wounded themselves -Why making sure your self-esteem is intact is so important if you want to succeed as a soldier in this long and brutal fight against terrorism. -What our country is doing to make sure that a life is not destroyed simply because a person made a mistake -Why even the most elite soldiers need to constantly train and hone their skills -The best way for anyone, no matter what your job or occupation, to be ready for anything that might come along. The following are links to other sites where you can find more information about Craig McDonough, the government employee interviewed in the feature story:

Captain Craig McDonough is assigned to Special Ops Command, the branch of the Air Force that handles special missions and unconventional warfare activities for the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He is the commander of the Joint Unconventional Warfare Task Force, responsible for gathering intelligence on terrorist threats, developing and coordinating covert actions to counter terrorism in war zones, and training other countries on unconventional warfare tactics. He is also responsible for training some of America's elite soldiers in unconventional combat techniques. Captain McDonough manages some of the highest risk missions in the world. His job is crucial to ensuring that this country stays secure while fighting a war on two fronts: One against terrorist groups like Al Qaeda and one against the Taliban. Captain McDonough attended the Air Force Academy and then graduated from Squadron Officer School. He began his career as an F-16 fighter pilot and served at the Air Force Academy where he became an instructor in military tactics. Later, he received a degree from the Defense Language Institute and was able to speak French and Russian. He also became a certified "SERE" (Survive, Evade, Resist and Escape) instructor. SERE is a training program designed to prepare special operations personnel for capture by enemy forces.
